Grand Knight's Column

ROBERT WOZNIAK

During the month of February, we take time to identify and remember three heroes in humanity, Abraham Lincoln, Saint Valentine and George Washington.

Both presidents Lincoln and Washington are associated with their outstanding credibility, i.e., "Honest Abe," and the famous words of young George, who said, "I cannot tell a lie." We also acknowledge the obvious generosity of Saint Valentine who sent notes of kindness and communication to his friends and followers while he was captive.

Both of the traits of honesty and generosity appear at first glance to be basic to human existence. Yet, I wonder if these men would stand out as heroes or legends if they lived among us today and openly exhibited these characteristics. The heroes and legends of the 1990's are seen by our children as super humans, who can mow down entire cities by themselves. They excel in martial arts, use the latest high technologies, know how to bypass all the systems—government, law and high finance, and have non-human names such as "Rambo", "Terminator", "Virtual Reality Troopers", "Power Rangers", or "Mantis". One additional feature of the 1990's heroes is that they all have unlimited monetary wealth.

In the real world of the nineties, heroes are identified by material traits rather than humanity traits. The heroes and legends of Wall Street are "High Tech Entrepreneurs" who anticipate the upcoming changes in the tax laws and know in advance how to beat them for next year. They are acknowledged for relentless dedication to working 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, on the maximization of profit through derivative market analysis, and beating the competition at all costs. The heroes and legends of government successfully complete their term of office when no scandals occur to force them out prematurely.

Wouldn't it be nice to add a new holiday in February to honor a hero or legend of the 1990's who was remembered for his honesty, generosity, outstanding leadership and contribution to humanity! Can you name one?
